Dr. CJ Rhoads

Abstract: Having to quickly teach your class online without much time for preparation is daunting, but not impossible. You don't need to have a polished video, you don't need to have interactive worksheets or powerpoints for students download. You just need your normal lecture notes on hand, a laptop with a camera and microphone, and students who are willing to call on the phone or click on a link. CJ Rhoads will share her experiences in teaching online without spending a huge amount of time pre-preparing asynchronous material for the students to read and respond. You can lecture, have discussions, give tests, and more.

About the speaker: Dr. CJ Rhoads has been at Kutztown University since 2004 as a Professor in the College of Business (though really she's been here since 1978 since she is an Alum of the College of Education). Her research interests include leadership development, business strategy, entrepreneurship, healthcare cost management, newly developed educational technologies, and integrative health practices. She is a widely published author with nine books and over 250 articles. She received her Doctoral degree in Educational Technology with a minor in Business Administration from Lehigh University, and her Master's degree from Temple University in Educational Psychology focusing on Instructional Design. Her experience with distance learning is deep and wide, starting with interactive television to provide college courses to students confined to nursing homes in Project REACH in 1989.
